To evaluate the prevalence of endocrine disorders in a cohort of women undergoing breast cancer screening. Observational study of a cohort of 495 women with low-risk early-stage breast cancer who had had a screening mammogram under the auspices of the Istituto Nazionale Tumori (Turin, Italy) and with no history of breast cancer. Data were collected on age at the time of the screening mammogram, breast-feeding history, family history of breast cancer, personal history of breast cancer, and history of oral contraceptive use or hormone replacement therapy. Laboratory measurements included basal- and estradiol-stimulated estrone and estradiol levels (performed in 561 of 569 subjects), fasting glucose and insulin levels, and the oral glucose tolerance test. A retrospective chart review was performed to collect information on previous treatment and on gynecologic and breast-diagnostic pathology findings. Forty-six of the 495 women were found to have endocrine disorders (incidence, 9.6%). Among controls with no endocrine disorders at screening, the median estradiol level was 99 pmol/L (interquartile range, 66-147 pmol/L). The 45 women with endocrine disorders had a statistically significant increase in estradiol levels compared with controls (133 +/- 40 pmol/L versus 61 +/- 17 pmol/L; P f678ea9f9e
